Abstract / Synopsis

In this lecture I begin with a discussion of the Becker paradox which states that capital punishment is optimal for society, even for minor crimes. But despite its optimality we rarely observe capital punishment in the real world – at least not for minor crimes. In the rest of the lecture I discuss some approaches to controlling corruption among public officials.